Reactie SeaWorld

As you likely know, Morgan was gravely ill at the time of her rescue, and it was later determined by experts and the Dutch government that she could not be successfully returned to the wild. We were asked to help because of our expertise in orca veterinary care and proud to do so as we have with so many other rescue organizations and government wildlife agencies.

We can also confirm that for the period between 2011-
2017 SeaWorld provided support for Morgan's care as part of the whale population in partnership with the professionals at Loro Parque. However, it is not true that Morgan was part of a transfer of our killer whales, nor was she ever bred as part of a SeaWorld killer whale breeding program which ended in 2016.
…
SeaWorld was asked to become involved with Morgan, and we did so despite incurring significant expenses, because it's part of our mission to protect animals in need. Our dedicated team of professionals devote their lives to this cause and because of them, SeaWorld has rescued more than 39,000 animals and is among the largest, if not the largest, marine animal rescue organizations in the world. We deeply believe that helping an animal unable to survive on its own is a responsibility we all share. We are proud to have played a part in saving Morgan's life.